

Learning Models to Inform Hands-On Education

FoodCorps' approach to hands-on education can be paired with many learning models. Inquire if there is a specific educational model or framework that the school in which you serve uses. If there is, explore how this can support you to meet your goals during service. The following section of the guide highlights three models that complement FoodCorps, including culturally responsive teaching, social and emotional learning, and place-based education. These models provide ideas and structures to support a thoughtful, student-centered approach to teaching that promotes experiential learning, whole-child development, and community engagement in a variety of settings. Read more to discover how to apply these practices to your service and how you can build connections between FoodCorps' approach to hands-on education and educational models educators at your school may use.
